Area of scientific research: problems of forming a model for the social behavior of students in an interactive group environment.

Scientific output of A. Liakisheva. Approximately 90 research works have been published, including a monograph, two textbooks, and a number of scientific articles.

Summary. The goal of this research school is to provide a general overview of various scientific approaches to the problem of shaping the social behaviour of students who are in an interactive group environment; attention is also focused on the essential aspects of group interaction and the peculiarities of its influence on the social behaviour of the individual, as well as on the structure of student social behaviour and on methods for diagnosing its formation.

Scientific activity of the school. Monograph and doctoral dissertation “The Theory-oriented and Methodology-related Base for Establishing Patterns of Social Behaviour among Students in an Interactive Group Environment”. In this dissertation an investigation was made regarding the specifics of the functioning of a student group as an interactive social community, as well as the influence of this group on the development of individuals involved, and on this foundation a model was devised. The socio-pedagogical conditions involved in the formation of student social behaviour were defined in terms of the process of group interaction.

On the basis of complete scientific analyses of the theoretical and applied aspects of the problem of shaping the social behaviour of students, methods were developed for improving it in the context of higher education institutions, providing a qualitatively superior new pattern for equipping students to function in the professional world after completing their education.
